They are mainly seed-eaters, but may also eat flesh. There are 52 species of butterflies in Papua New Guinea. The most common are the Papuan swallowtails. They are classified as Global 200 species Chromosomes In 1915, the chromosome numbers of Drosophila melanogaster and D. simulans were found to be 65+ X and 66+ X, respectively. Since then, D. melanogaster has remained the only species known to have an XX sex-determination system. It has been proposed that all Drosophila species currently known (with the exception of D. ananassae, D. nasuta, D. ananassae, D. ezoana and D. anastassiae) may have heterogametic males. However, most species may have lost their X-chromosome at some point in their evolution. The karyotypic behavior of D. ezoana and D. ananassae must be verified with the addition of comparative data from species of the D. melanogaster group. Species differences in chromosomes occur in regions of the X and Y chromosomes where the genes are expressed. Most of the differences involve small changes in the genes. These small differences are responsible for the characteristic behavior of the sex-specific genes. Species differences in Y chromosome morphology include the Y arm, a structure which is completely unique to the Y chromosome of the 3ef4e8ef8d
