You will find the desired resource(s) in the extracted archive. After extracting the archive, you should find a folder named Resources. There you will find the resource(s). Retention of letter-word pairs in older adults: a modeling of serial position curves. The importance of a smooth shift in retention performance with increasing levels of presentation has been demonstrated in the neuropsychological literature. In the present investigation, the authors conducted a modeling exercise to explore the role of initial performance and presentation format in retention of word pairs in older adults. Recognition of a 25-item list of words was conducted at 4, 12, and 24 hours after presentation. Serial position curves were modeled by subject using the two-parameter logistic functions described by Zhang and Pelican (1993). A variety of models were fit to the data and the values of the parameters describing the primacy and recency slopes and the rate of transition between the two zones were extracted. Although the drop-off in recall at higher levels of presentation was not as marked as in the earlier investigations by Zhang and Pelican, overall there was no evidence for either a generalized or specific decline of performance by 24 hours. The parameters characterizing initial recall and the rate of transition from the primacy zone to the recency zone, however, did differ in some respects across the three test sessions, indicating that individual differences in retention functioning can be delineated in this older adult sample. First apoptosis induction in the B cell area, infiltration of macrophages, and stromal loss. Staining for the proliferation marker Ki67 suggests an increase in proliferation during disease progression. The expression of p53 and the phosphorylation of MAPK suggest the existence of an alternative apoptosis induction pathway not involving apoptosis-inducing factor (AIF). CD20 is expressed during the early phase of disease progression, suggesting that in the absence of an efficient B cell response, the antibody B1 can mediate ADCC, a process which could be supported by locally produced IL-4 (Fig. 13 3e33713323
