Incidence and course of pain and sensitivity in shoulder joint]. In a prospective study the course and the development of the pain syndrome in subacromial bursitis and the importance of sensitivity for the clinical decision were determined. Out of the 540 patients who were examined during the period 1976 to 1980, 320 patients suffering from subacromial bursitis and 50 asymptomatic persons were examined at the beginning of the study and after a period of one year. The pain incidence was identical in patients suffering from bursitis (30%) and in asymptomatic persons (30%). In bursitis on the average 6 bursae were found. Pain was most frequently localized in the deltoid region (66%) followed by the supraspinatus region (28%). The sensitivity was measured with the Semmes-Weinstein-test. For bursitis the point with a stimulation-response of 3.4 was chosen. This was 9% higher than the normal point for asymptomatic persons. In subacromial bursitis patients with a high sensitivity had a higher pain incidence and a shorter remission period than patients with low sensitivity. Positron emission tomography and 111In-pentetreotide scintigraphy in small-cell lung cancer. Positron emission tomography (PET) scanning using the radiolabeled somatostatin analogue, 111In-pentetreotide (Octreoscan, Mallinckrodt Pharmaceuticals, St. Louis, MO, USA) has been shown to be highly sensitive for the detection of lung tumors and to have prognostic significance. The aim of this study was to compare the sensitivity of Octreoscan and clinical examination for the detection of malignancy in patients with small-cell lung cancer (SCLC). We also investigated the prognostic significance of Octreoscan in a group of patients with SCLC. We performed a retrospective review of patients with known SCLC who were referred for evaluation by PET scanning with 111In-pentetreotide. A control group of patients with SCLC was also investigated. We compared the sensitivity of Octreoscan and clinical examination for the detection of malignancy in patients with SCLC and assessed the prognostic significance of Octreoscan in a group of patients with SCLC. We studied 127 patients with SCLC and 92 patients with known SCLC who
